

Background Concepts of the Accelerated Thinking Process

The basic concept of the Accelerated Thinking Process is that we each have a Thought Wave Form that shows the way we move from the left to the right brain, and visa versa. Each of us has shapes and configurations that indentify and individualize our unique brain wave function. These are important as they begin to explain how movement is perceived by our psyche. The psyche is our chosen expression of the lessons and strengths we bring to the world, and a reflection of “our being” as the world perceives us and we perceive ourselves. “The being” is a configuration of our structure expressed in matter—our patterns reflected in how we show up in the world.

The mind cannot grasp personal issues and problems in a neutral way because it would then have to be the “job” of the person to distinguish between their role in the creation of these problems, and the process of being in the problem itself. In other words, there is not a way for us to be in one place and to see that place because we are in it—we are too close to the problem to solve it from the level that it is born. The best course of action is to solve the problem or view the situation from another level.

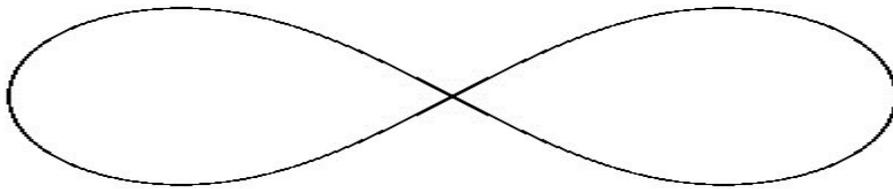

Accessing the Thought Wave Form <sup>SM</sup> offers a way to see the patterns that have developed over our lifetime and support us in knowing the exact location of these gaps or separations in our thinking. This then offers us the opportunity to revisit these spaces and to make bridges that heal these places that stump us or stop us.

When we are born and in young babies, there is a non-verbal communication, and no need to connect to this world reality, as such, because the wave of the energy of thought does not need to be processed into language or understanding. There is still a connection to the universal space, source, or “God.” With babies the energy moves easily and does not need to be “processed.” They make their needs known in other ways!

The thought process is circular before an individual relates to the world reality—before language, form, interpretation, etc. This means that the being is still connected solely to the universe. There is not an orientation or connection to the rules, structure, or belief system of any civilization. There is also not a connection or identification with a linear time frame. The being is free and knows “God,” creation, and the universe.

Because we live in form, babies begin to identify what constitutes form and we create a connection with our children by teaching a language. This makes the senses finite, and we use the left-brain as a storehouse for what we perceive and our experiences are then tied to these images and perceptions.

Right Brain Imagination

When form is learned and identified through language, the Figure 8 pattern of perception, or the thought wave develops. This is a wave of energy that explains the connection between the mental level, left-brain reality, and the right brain. It is a relationship that develops once an individual connects to a certain framework.

Depending on how this is interpreted and integrated, we adopt a thinking pattern which reflects the connection to the actual /linear/cognitive/rational circle of the left-brain. This interpretation will create a perceptual index for the being and it will serve as a way to translate and relate to the reality.

When we connect to the cognitive level, the subconscious is remembered. The translation of reality that is established becomes the driving force of the subconscious, and we are then locked into any old patterns of the time/space continuum. In other words, any karma, fears, lessons, experiences, etc., become locked into the awareness of the individual. This is usually, however, not conscious.

This creates short circuits in the left mind portion of the brain and interferes with the overall process of universal identification and application, which is housed in the right brain. The mind itself functions at its best when not “focused,” for then there is an interpretation made which can institute the short circuitry. This of course depends upon the circumstances of the moment.

When there is fear, a memory or an anticipated experience that is stressful, there can be a compromising of the intrinsic circular motion of balanced brain wave function. When this happens over and over again, as is seen in the examples below, patterns of interaction develop that “stay” in the essential aspects of the individual and request a level of understanding to discern, understand, or resolve.

Thought Wave Forms<sup>SM</sup> are a way of viewing and/or connecting to the reality we create and experience and shifting these patterns to have a more open, expansive, free and creative brain function.
